I. Introduction

1. The United States appeals from certain issues of law and legal interpretations in the Panel Report, United States – Transitional Safeguard Measure on Combed Cotton Yarn from Pakistan (the "Panel Report").¹ The Panel was established on 19 June 2000 to consider a complaint by Pakistan with respect to a transitional safeguard measure imposed by the United States under Article 6.2 of the Agreement on Textiles and Clothing (the "ATC ") on Category 301 imports of combed cotton yarn ("yarn") from Pakistan.

2. On 24 December 1998, the United States filed a request for bilateral consultations with Pakistan, pursuant to Article 6.7 of the ATC, on the proposed safeguard measure. The United States attached to this request its Report of Investigation and Statement of Serious Damage or Actual Threat Thereof: Combed Cotton Yarn for Sale: Category 301 (December 1998) (the "Market Statement"), which formed the basis for the proposed safeguard measure. This Market Statement set out the results of the investigation of the conditions prevailing in the United States' market for yarn. It defined the domestic industry to be investigated and concluded that increased imports had caused serious damage, and actual threat thereof, to the domestic industry, and that this damage and threat were attributable to Pakistan.

3. The United States held bilateral consultations with Pakistan in February 1999, which did not result in a mutually agreed solution. Consequently, the United States imposed the transitional safeguard measure at issue in this dispute in the form of a quantitative restriction on Category 301 imports of yarn from Pakistan. The safeguard measure was made effective for one year as of 17 March 1999 and was extended twice, each time for one further year, effective 17 March 2000 and 17 March 2001, respectively.

¹WT/DS192/R, 31 May 2001.

4. The Textiles Monitoring Body (the "TMB") reviewed the matter, pursuant to Articles 6.10 and 8.10 of the ATC, in April and in June 1999. The TMB concluded on both occasions that the United States had not demonstrated successfully that yarn was being imported into its territory in such increased quantities as to cause serious damage, or actual threat thereof, to its domestic industry producing like and/or directly competitive products. Accordingly, the TMB recommended that the safeguard measure introduced by the United States on imports of yarn from Pakistan be rescinded.² On 6 August 1999, the United States informed the TMB that it believed its action was justified under the provisions of Article 6 of the ATC and that it would maintain the safeguard measure.³ The United States and Pakistan held a further round of consultations in November 1999 but failed to reach a mutually agreed solution.

5. On 3 April 2000, Pakistan requested the establishment of a panel, pursuant to Article 8.10 of the ATC, Article XXIII:2 of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994 (the "GATT 1994") and Article 6 of the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes (the "DSU"). The factual aspects of this dispute are set out in greater detail in the Panel Report.⁴ The Panel considered Pakistan's claims that, in imposing the transitional safeguard measure, the United States acted inconsistently with Articles 6.2 and 6.4 of the ATC. Pakistan also requested that the Panel suggest, in accordance with the second sentence of Article 19.1 of the DSU, that the most appropriate way to implement the Panel's ruling would be to rescind the safeguard measure.⁵

6. In its Report, circulated to Members of the World Trade Organization (the "WTO") on 31 May 2001, the Panel concluded that the transitional safeguard measure imposed by the United States on imports of yarn from Pakistan was inconsistent with the provisions of Article 6 of the ATC. Specifically, the Panel found that:

- (a) Inconsistently with its obligations under [Article] 6.2, the United States excluded the production of combed cotton yarn by vertically integrated producers for their own use from the scope of the "domestic industry producing like and/or directly competitive products" with imported combed cotton yarn.
- (b) Inconsistently with its obligations under Article 6.4, the United States did not examine the effect of imports from Mexico (and possibly other appropriate Members) individually.

⁴Panel Report, paras. 2.1-2.10.

- (c) Inconsistently with its obligations under Articles 6.2 and 6.4, the United States did not demonstrate that the subject imports caused an "actual threat" of serious damage to the domestic industry.⁶ (footnote omitted)

7. The Panel further concluded that:

- (a) Pakistan did not establish that the US determination of serious damage was not justified based on the data used by the US investigating authority.
- (b) Pakistan did not establish that the US determination of serious damage was not justified regarding the evaluation by the US investigating authority of establishments that ceased producing combed cotton yarn.
- (c) Pakistan did not establish that the US determinations of serious damage and causation thereof were not justified based upon an inappropriately chosen period of investigation and period of incidence of serious damage and causation thereof.⁷

8. The Panel concluded that the United States' safeguard measure had nullified and impaired the benefits accruing to Pakistan under the Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization (the "WTO Agreement"), and in particular, under the ATC.⁸ Finally, the Panel recommended that the Dispute Settlement Body (the "DSB") request the United States to bring its safeguard measure into conformity with its obligations under the ATC, and suggested this could best be achieved by the prompt removal of the safeguard measure.⁹

9. On 9 July 2001, the United States notified the DSB of its intention to appeal certain issues of law covered in the Panel Report and certain legal interpretations developed by the Panel, pursuant to paragraph 4 of Article 16 of the DSU, and filed a Notice of Appeal, pursuant to Rule 20 of the Working Procedures for Appellate Review (the "Working Procedures"). On 19 July 2001, the United States filed its appellant's submission.¹⁰ On 3 August 2001, Pakistan filed its appellee's submission.¹¹ On the same day, the European Communities and India each filed a third participant's submission.¹²

II. Arguments of the Participants and Third Participants

A. Claims of Error by the United States – Appellant

1. Standard of Review

11. The United States claims that the Panel erred and exceeded the mandate of WTO dispute settlement panels set forth in Article 11 of the DSU by finding that, in assessing the conformity of a transitional safeguard measure with Article 6 of the ATC, it could consider evidence that was not in existence at the time of the competent authority's determination.

12. In the United States' view, the Panel misinterpreted the standard of review applicable to its assessment of the conformity of the transitional safeguard measure at issue with Article 6 of the ATC. In challenges to a transitional safeguard measure, the question before a panel is whether the determination, at the time it was made, was consistent with the requirements of Article 6 of the ATC. Such an assessment can be made only on the basis of facts in existence at that time. Examining a Member's determination on the basis of evidence that did not exist at that time would permit panels to strike down the determination of the competent authority for failing to anticipate facts that could emerge in the future. The United States argues that such a review would not be an "objective assessment" of the matter at issue, but would instead constitute a de novo review.

13. The United States submits that WTO jurisprudence strongly supports limiting a panel's consideration of evidence to that in existence at the time the competent authority made its determination. For instance, the panel in United States – Measure Affecting Imports of Woven Wool Shirts and Blouses from India ("United States – Shirts and Blouses"), an ATC dispute, found that an objective assessment must be based on facts in existence at the time of the determination.¹³ The panels that reviewed the consistency of safeguard measures under the Agreement on Safeguards in Korea – Definitive Safeguard Measure on Imports of Certain Dairy Products ("Korea – Dairy

¹³Panel Report, WT/DS33/R, adopted 23 May 1997, as upheld by the Appellate Body Report, WT/DS33/AB/R and Corr.1, DSR 1997:I, 343, para. 7.21.

Safeguard ") and sales of vertically integrated fabric producers over the years is further evidence of the fact that there is contravene these requirements by applying the transitional safeguard to all those Members meeting the criteria of Article 6.4.

28. According to the United States, the Panel's interpretation of Article 6.4 is inconsistent with the object and purpose of the ATC, which is to provide for a safeguard mechanism during the transition period for the integration of the textiles and clothing sector into the GATT 1994. The requirement to attribute serious damage and actual threat thereof to all Members whose imports cause serious damage would increase the burden imposed on importing Members and would undermine the responsiveness and value of the transitional safeguard mechanism. The United States adds that the Panel overlooked how Article 6.4 relates to the carefully negotiated balance of rights and obligations set out in the ATC.

29. The United States also argues that the Panel erred in relying primarily on non-transitional WTO agreements in making its findings under Article 6.4 of the ATC. Under customary rules of treaty interpretation, the Panel should have first and foremost interpreted the ordinary meaning of the terms of Article 6.4 in the light of their context and the object and purpose of the ATC. Appellate Body jurisprudence underscores this requirement²² as well as the need to remain within the "four corners" of the ATC.²³ In contrast, the Panel attempted to impute to the ATC words and concepts from the Agreement on Safeguards in the guise of "context" and thereby disregarded the unique, non-most-favoured-nation transitional safeguard mechanism under Article 6 of the ATC. The Panel conducted its analysis as if the textiles and clothing sector was already integrated into the GATT 1994 and as if the GATT 1994 rules already applied to it. The ATC intentionally created a mechanism different from Article XIX of the GATT 1994 and the Agreement on Safeguards for products not yet integrated into the GATT 1994. In addition, the Agreement on Safeguards, pursuant to its Article 11.1(c), does not apply to transitional safeguard measures taken under Article 6 of the ATC.

30. In conclusion, the United States claims that Article 6.4 of the ATC requires only a consideration of the factors enumerated therein as it relates to the Member or Members to whom the importing Member attributes serious damage and actual threat thereof. In the present case, the United States attributed serious damage and actual threat thereof to Pakistan based on each of the relevant requirements of Article 6.4. To require more — such as an individual assessment of each exporting Member meeting the criteria of Article 6.4 — would, in the United States' view, impute words and concepts into the ATC that are not there.

B. Arguments by Pakistan – Appellee

1. Standard of Review

31. Pakistan submits that the United States' claims and arguments are largely based on a mischaracterization of the Panel's rulings. There is nothing in the Panel's findings to suggest that a panel may conduct a de novo

35. To illustrate its argument, Pakistan submits the following hypothetical example: the United States determined, on the basis of data provided by the American Yarn Spinners Association ("AYSA") (the complainant before the competent authority), that the domestic production of yarn has declined by 50 percent. The United States Bureau of Census data, published subsequent to the determination of the competent authority, show that AYSA had provided incorrect data and that the domestic production had in fact increased by 50 percent. These newly available data leave no doubt that imports of yarn did not cause serious damage to the domestic yarn industry. Pakistan submits that, according to the contention of the United States, if the United States nevertheless maintains the safeguard measure and Pakistan brings a complaint under the DSU, the panel examining this complaint would be barred from considering the new Census data.

36. In Pakistan's view, the United States' arguments imply that a Member may impose a safeguard measure whenever a competent authority could legitimately conclude, on the basis of the facts before it, that the conditions for taking a safeguard action under Article 6 are met. However, Article 6.2 states that such an action may be taken "when, on the basis of a determination by a Member, it is demonstrated" (emphasis added) that increased imports cause serious damage or actual threat thereof. A determination that was based on completely false data does not provide the required demonstration. The role of a panel is not merely to make an objective assessment of the competent authority's investigation. The basic issue is whether the Member invoking Article 6 had the right to take the safeguard action. Therefore, in Pakistan's view, the challenge to an Article 6 safeguard measure does not necessarily call into question the integrity of the original investigation conducted by the competent authority.

37. Finally, Pakistan points out that, in contrast to other WTO agreements providing for safeguards or contingency protection, the ATC does not establish any specific requirements for public notice and comment during the investigation. In the case of many safeguard measures under Article 6, there will be evidence that only the exporting Member can furnish (for instance, its own statistics on recent exports) and that is, therefore, not "available" to the competent authority, under the procedures it is permitted to follow under the ATC. There will also be evidence that only the exporting Member has an interest in generating (such as precise data on plant closures) and which was, therefore, not "in existence" at the time of the investigation. If the United States' contentions were accepted, such evidence could be submitted, neither before the competent authority, nor before a panel, even though such evidence may be crucial or decisive in determining the conformity of a safeguard measure with the substantive requirements of Article 6.

41. Pakistan further submits that the Panel correctly rejected the contention of the United States that fabric producers which manufacture the yarn they consume are hermetically segregated from the merchant market for yarn. Fabric processed from captively produced yarn is sold on the same market as fabric processed from yarn purchased on the merchant market. A company that owns both a yarn plant and a fabric plant, therefore, cannot ignore the opportunity costs of manufacturing yarn. According to Pakistan, the yarn produced internally and the yarn available on the merchant market are thus, actually, in a competitive relationship.

42. In Pakistan's view, the United States' interpretation of the term "and/or" fails to give meaning and effect to all the terms of the ATC. The United States' interpretation would give Members the right to define the domestic industry, inter alia, as the producers of "like but not directly competitive purpose of the ATC. Pakistan also argues that if the United States were permitted to define the domestic industry as the manufacturers of yarn for sale, it would have been required to impose its restraint only on imports of yarn for sale and not, as it has done, on all imports.

3. Attribution of Serious Damage

46. Pakistan requests the Appellate Body to uphold the Panel's finding that Article 6.4 of the ATC obliges Members to examine the effect of imports from different Members individually. The terms "Member-by-Member" and "attribute" in Article 6.4 do not give the importing Member the right to arbitrarily "pick and choose" the Members included in the attribution analysis. According to its dictionary definition, the term "by" appearing between two nouns indicates a succession of groups, quantities or individuals of the same class, such as in two-by-two or man-by-man.²⁸ The requirement that the safeguard "shall be applied on a Member-by-Member basis" means, therefore, that the restrictions shall be imposed on a Member-specific basis. "Member-by-Member" does not mean "any Member", and hence does not suggest that certain exporting Members may be arbitrarily excluded from the attribution of the serious damage. Pakistan adds that the requirement to apply restrictions on a Member-by-Member basis is intended to permit exporting Members to administer the restrictions in accordance with Article 4.2 of the ATC and to capture the quota rents. It also permits the importing Member to determine the level of the restrictions individually, in accordance with the criteria set out in the second sentence of Article 6.4.

47. Pakistan points out that "to attribute" means to ascribe an effect to its cause. In the context of Article 6.4, it means to ascribe the effect of the overall increase in imports to the imports from particular Members. The attribution thus requires a causation analysis limited to imports from individual Members. The difference in meaning of "cause" and of "attribute" does not, therefore, support the United States' interpretation of Article 6.4 of the ATC. This provision requires that the attribution of serious damage to individual Members be made, among other things, on the basis of "the level of imports compared with imports from other sources, market share and import and domestic prices". (emphasis added) As the panel in United States – Underwear concluded, Article 6.4 requires Members to assess comparatively the imports from different sources and their respective effects.²⁹ In Pakistan's view, the terms "individually" and "compared" found in Article 6.4, leave no doubt that the importing Member must assess all potential sources of serious damage and cannot limit its attribution analysis arbitrarily to one Member.

²⁹Panel Report, WT/DS24/R, adopted 25 February 1997, as modified by the Appellate Body Report, supra, footnote 19, DSR 1997:I, 31, para. 7.49.

48. Pakistan further argues that Articles 6.1 and 6.6 of the ATC do not support the "pick-and-

C. Arguments of the Third Participants

1. European Communities

52. In its third participant's submission, the European Communities confines itself to the question of permissible evidence and submits that a panel's review concerns the work of the competent authority at the time of its determination.

53. The European Communities argues that panels are not empowered to evaluate the work of the competent authority on the basis of evidence that was objectively not available, for example, not in existence, at the time of the determination. This would go beyond the "independent duty of investigation" of the competent authority, which clearly cannot be asked to take into account what is not reasonably available to it while conducting a proper and thorough investigation. However, the European Communities considers that there may be cases where a panel needs to consider evidence that comes into existence after the competent authority's determination, in order to examine the sufficiency and thoroughness of the investigation. As an example, the European Communities refers to a statement from a statistical agency, dated after the investigation, to the effect that it could have produced reliable import statistics if asked, but that it was not.

54. The European Communities emphasizes that, despite the irrelevance of information objectively not available at the time of the determination to assess the WTO-consistency of that determination, panels should strictly scrutinize the accuracy of the competent authority's investigation. This scrutiny is all the more necessary for safeguard measures taken under the ATC, since that Agreement does not provide for any right to seek removal of a measure that has been adopted without the necessary conditions being fulfilled. In the European Communities' view, this means, for example, that panels should review whether the competent authority seriously tried to verify data which did not come from official sources.

2. India

(a) Standard of Review

55. India submits that the Panel correctly concluded that it could "examine any evidence ... for the purpose of evaluating the thoroughness and sufficiency of the ... [determination by the competent] authority."³¹ Article 6.2 of the ATC states that a safeguard action may be taken "when, on the basis of a determination by a Member, it is demonstrated " (emphasis added) that increased imports cause serious damage or actual threat thereof. A determination based on completely incorrect data does not provide this required demonstration. Moreover, under Article 6.3 of the ATC, the determination must be based on an examination of changes in specified economic variables. A determination based on an examination in which completely false data on those variables were used, does not meet that requirement. The role of a panel is, therefore, not merely to make an objective assessment of the competent authority's investigation. In India's view, a panel must also assess whether the results of that investigation are capable of demonstrating that the conditions for imposing the safeguard measure were met at the time the determination was made.

56. India submits, therefore, that panels, pursuant to Article 11 of the DSU, may examine evidence not available or submitted to the competent authority at the time of the investigation for the purpose of determining whether the conditions for a safeguard action were satisfied at that time. The Panel further made it clear, in its ruling, that such evidence would be relevant under Article 6 of the ATC only if it related to crucial or decisive facts in existence at the time of the investigation. Accordingly, India requests the Appellate Body to find that the Panel's conclusions were consistent with the DSU and the ATC.

(b) Definition of the Domestic Industry

57. India requests the Appellate Body to uphold the Panel's finding that the United States' exclusion of captively produced yarn from the definition of the domestic industry is inconsistent with Article 6.2 of the ATC. This provision refers to the "domestic industry producing like and/or directly competitive products", not to the domestic industry selling those products. In India's view, the ATC defines the domestic industry as the entire domestic industry producing like and/or directly competitive products.

58. India, therefore, disagrees with the United States' interpretation of the domestic industry definition as allowing a range of different industry definitions. India submits that such flexibility would undermine the objective of the ATC of orderly transition and integration of the textiles and clothing sector into the framework of the GATT 1994. India stresses that vertical integration is one form of autonomous industrial adjustment in response to the liberalization of trade in textiles and clothing. The United States' interpretation of Article 6.2 of the ATC is prejudicial to meaningful liberalization of trade in textiles and to autonomous industrial adjustment.

interpretation that an importing Member may pick and choose the Member(s) for which it carries out an attribution analysis.

60. India submits that the Panel correctly concluded that the application of safeguards on a "Member-by-Member" basis and the individual attribution of the damage in Article 6.4 of the ATC do not enable an importing Member to arbitrarily limit its attribution analysis to the imports of one Member only. India asserts that this Member would then suffer a disproportionate share of the effect of the safeguard measure. That result would also be the least consistent with the most-favoured-nation principle and hinder the progressive integration of the textiles and clothing sector into the framework of the GATT 1994. India submits that the Panel's conclusions are firmly based on the text of Article 6.4, its context and the object and purpose of the ATC.

III. Issues Raised in this Appeal

61. This appeal raises the following issues:

- (a) Whether the Panel erred and exceeded the mandate of WTO dispute settlement panels set forth in Article 11 of the DSU by finding that, in examining the conformity of a transitional safeguard measure with Article 6 of the ATC, it could consider evidence that was not in existence at the time of the Member's determination;
- (b) Whether the Panel erred in finding that the United States acted inconsistently with Article 6.2 of the ATC by excluding from the scope of the domestic industry the production of combed cotton yarn by vertically integrated producers for their own internal use; and
- (c) Whether the Panel erred in (i) stating that Article 6.4 of the ATC requires attribution to all Members whose exports cause serious damage or actual threat thereof, and (ii) finding that the United States acted inconsistently with Article 6.4 by failing to consider the effect of imports from Mexico.

IV. Standard of Review

62. The investigation by the competent authority of the United States leading to the imposition of the transitional safeguard measure on Category 301 imports of combed cotton yarn ("yarn") from Pakistan covered the period from January 1996 until the end of August 1998. The United States relied on data supplied by the American Yarn Spinners Association ("AYSA") and on official data collected by the United States' Bureau of Census for the period up to the end of 1997. For the eight-month period from January to August 1998, the competent authority relied exclusively on AYSA data because official Census data for the calendar year 1998 ("1998 Census data") were published only in the course of 1999, after the United States had made its determination within the meaning of Article 6.2 of the ATC.³² We note that the participants agree that the date of determination was 24 December 1998, when the United States published its Report of Investigation and Statement of Serious Damage or Actual Threat Thereof: Combed Cotton Yarn for Sale: Category 301 (December 1998) (the "Market Statement") and requested bilateral consultations with Pakistan pursuant to Article 6.7.³³

63. Pakistan argued before the Panel that the determination made by the United States was based on "unverified, incorrect and incomplete data"³⁴, and submitted the 1998 Census data in support of its contention. The United States objected to the use of such data by the Panel because that data did not exist when it made its determination. The Panel concluded:

[W]e shall not examine any evidence for the purpose of reinvestigating the market situation, but we should examine any evidence, without regard to whether it was available or considered at the time of investigation, for the purpose of evaluating the thoroughness and sufficiency of the investigation underpinning the decision of the US authority. (footnote omitted, emphasis added)

Accordingly, in our view, the 1998 calendar year US Census data should be examined by the Panel, even though they were not available to the US government at the time of investigation, in order to confirm whether the reliance by the US investigation authority on the AYSA data is justifiable.³⁵

64. The Panel, therefore, took into account the 1998 Census data, but concluded that the new data did not vitiate the determination of serious damage by the United States.³⁶

65. The United States argues on appeal that the Panel erred and exceeded the mandate of WTO dispute settlement panels set forth in Article 11 of the DSU by finding that, in assessing the conformity of the transitional safeguard measure with Article 6 of the ATC, it could examine evidence that was not in existence at the time the United States made its determination of serious damage or threat thereof to the domestic industry.

66. The United States' appeal does not concern the question whether a panel may consider evidence relating to facts that occurred subsequent to the determination.³⁷ Nor does this appeal relate to the question whether a panel may consider evidence which existed before the date of determination, but which was not submitted to the importing Member, or, although submitted, was

68. Article 11 of the DSU lays down the standard of review for panels in disputes under the covered agreements⁴⁰ in the following terms:

[A] panel should make an objective assessment of the matter before it, including an objective assessment of the facts of the case and the applicability of and conformity with the relevant covered agreements, and make such other findings as will assist the DSB in making the recommendations or in giving the rulings provided for in the covered agreements. ... (emphasis added)

69. We have considered this standard of review on several occasions.⁴¹ In EC Measures Concerning Meat and Meat Products (Hormones), we stated:

So far as fact-finding by panels is concerned, their activities are always constrained by the mandate of Article 11 of the DSU: the applicable standard is neither de novo review as such, nor "total deference", but rather the "objective assessment of the facts".⁴² (emphasis added)

70. This is the first time we are required to consider a panel's standard of review under Article 11 in a dispute under the ATC. We note that the panels in United States – Underwear and United States – Shirts and Blouses considered this standard of review when examining the consistency of transitional safeguard measures with Article 6 of the ATC. The panel in United States – Underwear stated:

⁴⁰Article 1.1, first sentence, of the DSU. For disputes under the Anti-Dumping Agreement, Article 17.6 of that Agreement "prevails" over Article 11 of the DSU "[t]o the extent that there is a difference" between these provisions. (Article 1.2, second sentence, of the DSU) See, Appellate Body Report, United States – Anti-Dumping Measures on Certain Hot-Rolled Steel Products from Japan ("United States – Hot-Rolled Steel"), WT/DS184/AB/R, adopted 23 August 2001, paras. 50-62; and, Appellate Body Report, Thailand – Anti-Dumping Duties on Angles, Shapes and Sections of Iron or Non-Alloy Steel and H-Beams from Poland, WT/DS122/AB/R, adopted 5 April 2001, paras. 131-138.

⁴²Appellate Body Report, WT/DS26/AB/R, WT/DS48/AB/R, adopted 13 February 1998, DSR 1998:I, 135, para. 117. We wish to emphasize that, although panels are not entitled to conduct a de novo review of the evidence, nor to substitute their own conclusions for those of the competent authorities, this does not mean that panels must simply accept the conclusions of the competent authorities. (Appellate Body Report, United States – Lamb Safeguard, supra, footnote 41, para. 106)

[A]n objective assessment would entail an examination of whether the CITA had examined all relevant facts before it ..., whether adequate explanation had been provided of how the facts as a whole supported the determination made, and, consequently, whether the determination made was consistent with the international obligations of the United States.⁴³

71. We have, however, examined a panel's standard of review in several cases under the Agreement on Safeguards. In Argentina – Footwear Safeguard, we reiterated that a panel must not conduct a de novo review of the evidence nor substitute its analysis and judgment for that of the competent authority.⁴⁴ Yet, we emphasized:

[T]he Panel was obliged, by the very terms of Article 4 [of the Agreement on Safeguards], to assess whether the Argentine authorities had examined all the relevant facts and had provided a reasoned explanation of how the facts supported their determination.⁴⁵

72. In United States – Lamb Safeguard, we held that, in considering a claim under the Agreement on Safeguards, a "panel's objective assessment involves a formal aspect and a substantive aspect. The formal aspect is whether the competent authorities have evaluated 'all relevant factors'.⁴⁶ We stated further that, in reviewing determinations of competent authorities, panels should not simply accept the conclusions of that authority:

Panels must ... review whether the competent authorities' explanation fully addresses the nature, and, especially, the complexities, of the data, and responds to other plausible interpretations of that data. A panel must find, in particular, that an explanation is not reasoned, or is not adequate, if some alternative explanation of the facts is plausible, and if the competent authorities' explanation does not seem adequate in the light of that alternative explanation.⁴⁷ (emphasis added)

73. In United States – Wheat Gluten Safeguard, concerning a claim under the Agreement on Safeguards, we considered the duties of competent authorities^{9de-0.0 we Tiv.724 Tc ir " Tw (we m wwyeten3,}

77. The exercise of due diligence by a Member cannot imply, however, the examination of evidence that did not exist and that, therefore, could not possibly have been taken into account when the Member made its determination. The demonstration by a Member that a particular product is being imported into its territory in such increased quantities as to cause serious damage (or actual threat thereof) to the domestic industry can be based only on facts and evidence which existed at the time the determination was made. The urgent nature of such an investigation may not permit the Member to delay its determination in order to take into account evidence that might be available only at a future date. Even a determination on the existence of threat of serious injury must be based on projections extrapolating from existing data.⁵⁰

78. In our view, a panel

80. For these reasons, we find that the Panel exceeded its mandate under Article 11 of the DSU by considering United States Census data for the calendar year 1998.

81. There is no need for the purpose of this appeal to express a view on the question whether an importing Member would be under an obligation, flowing from the "pervasive"⁵² general principle of good faith that underlies all treaties⁵³, to withdraw a safeguard measure if post-determination evidence relating to pre-determination facts were to emerge revealing that a determination was based on such a critical factual error that one of the conditions required by Article 6 turns out never to have been met.

V. Definition of the Domestic Industry

82. The United States defined the domestic industry as the producers of yarn who produced it for sale on the merchant market, thereby excluding from the scope of its definition the vertically integrated fabric producers who produce yarn for their own internal use.⁵⁴ Pakistan claimed before the Panel that the United States violated Article 6.2 of the ATC because it did not investigate the entire domestic industry producing yarn.

83. The Panel found that:

Inconsistently with its obligations under [Article] 6.2, the United States excluded the production of combed cotton yarn by vertically integrated producers for their own use from the scope of the "domestic industry producing like and/or directly competitive products" with imported combed cotton yarn.⁵⁵ (emphasis added)

⁵²Appellate Body Report, United States – Tax Treatment for "Foreign Sales Corporations", WT/DS108/AB/R, adopted 20 March 2000, para. 166. See also, Appellate Body Report, United States – Hot-Rolled Steel, supra, footnote 40, para. 101, where we noted that this principle "informs the provisions of the Anti-Dumping Agreement, as well as the other covered agreements."

⁵³We recall that in United States – Shrimp,

84. The United States appeals this finding of the Panel. The United States submits that Article 6.2 permits a definition of the domestic industry on the basis of products that are not only like but also directly competitive with the imported product. According to the United States, yarn sold on the merchant market and yarn produced by vertically integrated fabric producers for their own internal consumption are like, but they are not directly competitive with each other. The United States argues that, by rejecting its definition of the domestic industry, the Panel failed to give full meaning and effect to the term "and/or" in Article 6.2 and reduced the word "and" to inutility. The United States also argues that the Panel should have interpreted the definition of the domestic industry within the four corners of the ATC without having recourse to the wider context of other agreements of the WTO containing a definition of the domestic industry.

85. We begin our analysis of this issue with the definition of the domestic industry as stated in the relevant part of Article 6.2 of the ATC, which provides:

Safeguard action may be taken under this Article when, on the basis of a determination by a Member, it is demonstrated that a particular product is being imported into its territory in such increased quantities as to cause serious damage, or actual threat thereof, to the domestic industry producing like and/or directly competitive products. (footnote omitted, emphasis added)

86.

88. We now turn to the next two components of the definition of the domestic industry under Article 6.2 of the ATC, namely, like products and directly competitive products.

89. We note that there is no disagreement between the participants⁵⁸ that yarn imported from Pakistan and yarn produced by the producers of the United States, regardless of whether they are vertically integrated fabric producers or independent yarn producers, are like products. The United States has made it clear in its arguments⁵⁹ that its exclusion of yarn produced by vertically integrated fabric producers from the definition of the domestic industry was not because they are not producing a like product, but because they are not producing a directly competitive product. It is, therefore, not necessary for us to address the meaning of the term "like products" for the purposes of this appeal.

90. Before we examine the term "directly competitive" in the specific context of Article 6.2 and the facts of this particular case, we consider it useful to recall our interpretation of this term on previous occasions.

91. We have interpreted the term "directly competitive" in *Korea – Alcoholic Beverages*⁶⁰ and Japan – Taxes on Alcoholic Beverages.⁶¹ We are cognizant of the fact that these two reports interpreted this term in the context of the Interpretative Note Ad Article III:2 of the GATT 1994. We will refer to this aspect later. The key elements of the interpretation of the term "directly competitive" in our Report in Korea – Alcoholic Beverages are:

- (a) The word "competitive" means "characterised by competition". The context of the competitive relationship is necessarily the marketplace, since that is the forum where consumers choose different products that offer alternative ways of satisfying a particular need or taste. As competition in the marketplace is a dynamic and evolving process, the competitive relationship between products is not to be analyzed exclusively by current consumer preferences⁶²; the competitive relationship extends as well to potential competition.⁶³

⁶²*Supra*, footnote 20, paras. 114-115.

⁶³*Ibid.*, paras. 115 and 117.

- (b) According to the ordinary meaning of the term "directly competitive", products are competitive or substitutable when they are interchangeable or if they offer alternative ways of satisfying a particular need or taste.⁶⁴
- (c) In the context of Article III:2, second sentence, the qualifying word "directly" in the Ad Article suggests a degree of proximity in the competitive relationship between the domestic and imported products. The word "directly" does not, however, prevent a consideration of both latent and extant demand.⁶⁵
- (d) "Like" products are a subset of directly competitive or substitutable products: all like products are, by definition, directly competitive or substitutable products, whereas not all "directly competitive or substitutable" products are "like".⁶⁶

92. The United States argues that the Panel's over-reliance on our Report in Korea – Alcoholic Beverages is mistaken for two reasons. First, that dispute involved interpretation of a different phrase ("directly competitive or substitutable"), of a different provision and agreement (Article III:2 of the GATT 1994), and in a different factual setting. In particular, the word "substitutable" is not used in juxtaposition with "directly competitive" in Article 6.2 of the ATC. Second, the Appellate Body emphasized, in that case, the importance of the marketplace in judging the competitive relationship between products because that is the forum where consumers choose between different products. According to the United States, a proper reading of the Appellate Body's reasoning reveals that if a domestic product does not enter the marketplace at all, it cannot be regarded as being "directly competitive" with the imported product, even though the two products may admittedly be "like products".

93. We are not persuaded by these arguments of the United States with respect to the relevance and interpretation of our Report in Korea – Alcoholic Beverages.

94. With respect to the first argument of the United States, a careful reading of our Report in that case would show that we used the terms "directly competitive" and "directly substitutable" without implying any distinction between them in assessing the competitive relationship between products.⁶⁷ We do not consider that the mere absence of the word "substitutable" in Article 6.2 of the ATC renders our interpretation of the term "directly competitive" under Article III:2 of the GATT 1994 irrelevant in terms of its contextual significance for the interpretation of that term under Article 6.2 of the ATC.

⁶⁴*Supra*, footnote 20, para. 115.

⁶⁶*Ibid.*, para. 118.

⁶⁷*See, ibid.*, paras. 114-116.

95. We now turn to an examination of the term "directly competitive" in the specific context of Article 6.2 of the ATC and the dispute before us. We must bear in mind that Article 6.2 permits a safeguard action to be taken in order to protect a domestic industry from serious damage (or actual threat thereof) caused by a surge in imports, provided the domestic industry is identified as the industry producing "like and/or directly competitive products" in comparison with the imported product. The criteria of "like" and "directly competitive" are characteristics attached to the domestic product in order to ensure that the domestic industry is the appropriate industry in relation to the imported product. The degree of proximity between the imported and domestic products in their competitive relationship is thus critical to underpin the reasonableness of a safeguard action against an imported product.

96. According to the ordinary meaning of the term "competitive", two products are in a competitive relationship if they are commercially interchangeable, or if they offer alternative ways of satisfying the same consumer demand in the marketplace. "Competitive" is a characteristic attached to a product and denotes the capacity of a product to compete both in a current or a future situation. The word "competitive" must be distinguished from the words "competing" or "being in actual competition". It has a wider connotation than "actually competing" and includes also the notion of a potential to compete. It is not necessary that two products be competing, or that they be in actual competition with each other, in the marketplace at a given moment in order for those products to be regarded as competitive. Indeed, products which are competitive may not be actually competing with each other in the marketplace at a given moment for a variety of reasons, such as regulatory restrictions or producers' decisions. Thus, a static view is incorrect, for it leads to the same products being regarded as competitive at one moment in time, and not so the next, depending upon whether or not they are in the marketplace.

97. It is significant that the word "competitive" is qualified by the word "directly", which emphasizes the degree of proximity that must obtain in the competitive relationship between the products under comparison. As noted earlier, a safeguard action under the ATC is permitted in order to protect the domestic industry against competition from an imported product. To ensure that such protection is reasonable, it is expressly provided that the domestic industry must be producing "like" and/or "directly competitive products". Like products are, necessarily, in the highest degree of competitive relationship in the marketplace.⁶⁸ In permitting a safeguard action, the first consideration is, therefore, whether the domestic industry is producing a like product as compared with the imported product in question. If this is so, there can be no doubt as to the reasonableness of the safeguard action against the imported product.

98. When, however, the product produced by the domestic industry is not a "like product" as compared with the imported product, the question arises how close should be the competitive relationship between the imported product and the "unlike" domestic product. It is common knowledge that unlike or dissimilar products compete or can compete in the marketplace to varying degrees, ranging from direct or close competition to remote or indirect competition. The more unlike or dissimilar two products are, the more remote or indirect their competitive relationship will be in the marketplace. The term "competitive" has, therefore, purposely been qualified and limited by the word "directly" to signify the degree of proximity that must obtain in the competitive relationship when the products in question are unlike. Under this definition of "directly", a safeguard action will not extend to protecting a domestic industry that produces unlike products which have only a remote or tenuous competitive relationship with the imported product.

99. We will now examine whether, in this case, yarn produced by the vertically integrated fabric producers of the United States for their own captive consumption is directly competitive with the imported yarn for the purposes of Article 6.2 of the ATC. The United States argues that such yarn is not directly competitive because it is not offered for sale on the market except when the captive production is "out of balance"⁶⁹, and even then only in de minimis quantities. In addition, vertically integrated fabric producers are not dependent on the merchant market for meeting any of their requirements of yarn except to a de minimis extent. In the United States' view, these factors are clearly reflected in the very low and stable rate of yarn sold or purchased by vertically integrated fabric producers to or from the merchant market over the last several years.⁷⁰

100. We are unable to subscribe to this static view which makes the competitive relationship between yarn sold on the merchant market and yarn used for internal consumption by vertically integrated producers dependent on what they choose to do at a particular point in time.

⁶⁸Appellate Body Report, Korea – Alcoholic Beverages, supra, footnote 20, para. 118; Appellate Body Report, Canada – Certain Measures Concerning Periodicals, WT/DS31/AB/R, adopted 30 July 1997, DSR 1997:I, 449, was previously regarded as non-directly competitive would suddenly become directly competitive.

- (d) The approach of the United States would lead to another result which, in our view, cannot be justified. The domestic captive production of yarn by vertically integrated fabric producers would be excluded from the determination of serious damage (or actual threat thereof). However, a safeguard action taken against imported yarn would benefit the vertically integrated fabric producers with respect to the totality of their yarn production, not only with respect to the yarn they sell in the merchant market, but also with respect to yarn they produce for their own consumption.
- (e) Finally, the approach of the United States would have major consequences for the justification and scope of the safeguard action. The exclusion of domestic captive production of yarn from the definition of the domestic industry would imply that if a fabric producer imports such yarn from a foreign plant that it owns, such import would also have to be excluded from the calculation of the surge in imports and from the application of the safeguard action. In the case before us, the safeguard action applies to all imports. The United States points out that, in this case, this issue does not arise as there are no imports of captively produced yarn from Pakistan; all the imports from Pakistan are destined for the merchant market. This may have been so until now, but the situation may well change in the future. Captively produced imports which had been exempt from the safeguard action could be sold on the merchant market if their prices were lower than those on the merchant market. This would undermine the effectiveness of the safeguard measure.

102. The United States also argues that our ruling in United States – Hot-Rolled Steel supports its contention that the captive segment of the market can be separated from the merchant market segment because we observed that captive production was "shielded from direct competition".⁷⁴ We did not hold, however, that captive production can be excluded from either the definition of the domestic industry or from the injury analysis. We said that, while an injury analysis can be carried out segment-by-segment before assessing damage to the domestic industry as a whole, an analysis of the captive segment of the market cannot be excluded. Our observation that captive steel production was "shielded from direct competition" did not mean that steel produced in the captive market segment is not directly competitive with imported steel destined for the merchant market. Our ruling in United States – Hot-Rolled Steel, therefore, does not support the argument of the United States.

⁷⁴United States' statement at the oral hearing; Appellate Body Report, supra, footnote 40, paras. 198 and 207.

103. For all these reasons, we do not accept the contention of the United States that yarn produced by the vertically integrated fabric producers of the United States is not "directly competitive" with yarn imported from Pakistan.

104. We now turn to the interpretation of the connectors "and/or" in Article 6.2, on which the participants disagree.⁷⁵ We note that the definition of the domestic industry adopted by the United States in this case would be consistent with Article 6.2 only if we were to find: (i) that captively produced yarn is not directly competitive with imported yarn; and (ii) that the connectors "and/or" in Article 6.2 permit defining the domestic industry on the basis of a product which is not only like but also directly competitive with the imported product. We have reached the conclusion that captively produced yarn is directly competitive with imported yarn sold on the merchant market. We, therefore, do not need to address the interpretation of the connectors "and/or" in Article 6.2.

105. For all these reasons, we find that combed cotton yarn produced by vertically integrated fabric producers for their internal consumption is "directly competitive" with combed cotton yarn imported from Pakistan. Accordingly, we uphold the Panel's finding, in paragraph 8.1(a) of its Report, that the United States acted inconsistently with Article 6.2 of the ATC, by excluding from the scope of the domestic industry the production of combed cotton yarn by vertically integrated producers for their own internal use.

VI. Attribution of Serious Damage

106. Pakistan claimed before the Panel that the United States acted inconsistently with the requirements of Article 6.4 of the ATC because it "attributed serious damage to imports from Pakistan without making a comparative assessment of the imports from Pakistan and Mexico and their respective effects."⁷⁶

⁷⁵*See, supra*, paras. 19, 20, 38 and 84.

⁷⁶Panel Report, paras. 3.1 and 7.2(a).

107. The Panel stated:

This does not mean, however, that a Member imposing a safeguard restraint can then pick and choose for which Member(s) it will make an attribution analysis. The attribution cannot be made only to some of the Members causing damage, it must be made to all

110. We note that the claims made by Pakistan before the Panel⁸² related to the question of attribution of serious damage or actual threat thereof to the Members the imports from whom contributed to that damage or threat. However, these claims did not relate to the question of application of safeguard measures. The Panel did not make a ruling on application per se, although, in the course of its reasoning on the question of attribution of serious damage, it interpreted the phrase "shall be applied on a Member-by-Member basis" in the first sentence of Article 6.4⁸³, an interpretation that has not been appealed. The Panel also found that "Pakistan did not establish that the US determinations of serious damage and causation thereof were not justified based upon an inappropriately chosen period of investigation and period of incidence of serious damage and causation thereof"⁸⁴, and this finding has not been appealed either. Hence, the issues raised by the United States in this appeal concern only the attribution of serious damage or actual threat thereof to Member(s) imports from whom contributed to that damage.

111. The question of attribution is addressed in the following sentence of Article 6.4:

The Member or Members to whom serious damage, or actual threat thereof, referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3, is attributed, shall be determined on the basis of a sharp and substantial increase in imports, actual or imminent, from such a Member or Members individually, and on the basis of the level of imports as compared with imports from other sources, market share, and import and domestic prices at a comparable stage of commercial transaction; none of the Member(s) given decisive guidance (footnote omitted), can necessarily give decisive guidance. (footnote omitted)

118. Article 6.4 provides, in relevant part, that "[t]he Member or Members to whom serious damage ... is attributed, shall be determined on the basis of a sharp and substantial increase in imports ... from such a Member or Members". (emphasis added) The clear inference from this phrase is that the sharp and substantial increase of imports from such a Member determines not only the basis, but also the scope of attribution of serious damage to that Member.

119. In consequence, where imports from more than one Member contribute to serious damage, it is only that part of the total damage which is actually caused by imports from such a Member that can be attributed to that Member under Article 6.4, second sentence. Damage that is actually caused to the domestic industry by imports from one Member cannot, in our view, be attributed to a different Member imports from whom were not the cause of that part of the damage. This would amount to a "mis-attribution" of damage and would be inconsistent with the interpretation in good faith of the terms of Article 6.4.⁸⁸ Therefore, the part of the total serious damage attributed to an exporting Member must be proportionate to the damage caused by the imports from that Member. Contrary to the view of the United States, we believe that Article 6.4, second sentence, does not permit the attribution of the totality of serious damage to one Member⁸⁹, unless the imports from that Member alone have caused all the serious damage.

120. Our view is supported further by the rules of general international law on state responsibility, which require that countermeasures in response to breaches by states of their international obligations be commensurate with the injury suffered.⁹⁰ In the same vein, we note that Article 22.4 of the DSU⁹¹ stipulates that the suspension of concessions shall be equivalent to the level of nullification or impairment. This provision of the DSU has been interpreted consistently as not justifying punitive damages.⁹² These two examples illustrate the consequences of breaches by states of their international obligations, whereas a safeguard action is merely a remedy to WTO-consistent "fair trade" activity.⁹³ It would be absurd if the breach of an international obligation were sanctioned by proportionate countermeasures, while, in the absence of such breach, a WTO Member would be subject to a disproportionate and, hence, "punitive", attribution of serious damage not wholly caused by its exports. In our view, such an exorbitant derogation from the principle of proportionality in

This conclusion is even more obvious for the comparison of import and domestic prices. The price of imports from one Member can be compared with the average price of imports from other sources and with domestic prices. However, prices of imports from the other Members may vary widely from one another. A fair assessment of the effects of the price of imports from one Member will therefore require a comparison with the price of imports from other Members taken individually. Moreover, these different factors interact in different ways, producing different effects, under different circumstances, not to mention the possible existence of other relevant factors (and their effects) that must be taken into account in the comparison according to the proviso at the end of Article 6.4, second sentence.

124. An assessment of the share of total serious damage, which is proportionate to the damage actually caused by imports from a particular Member, requires, therefore, a comparison according to the factors envisaged in Article 6.4 with all other Members (from whom imports have also increased sharply and substantially) taken individually.

125. In the appeal before us, Pakistan is not the only Member from whom imports have increased sharply and substantially. It is not in dispute that Mexico also falls into this category.⁹⁴ We, therefore, consider that the share of the serious damage attributable to imports from Pakistan can be properly assessed only in the light of the effects of the imports from Mexico.

126. Accordingly, albeit for reasons partly different from those given by the Panel, we uphold the finding in paragraph 8.1(b) of the Panel Report that the United States acted inconsistently with Article 6.4 by not examining the effect of imports from Mexico (and possibly other appropriate Members) individually when attributing serious damage to Pakistan.

127. We finally turn to the United States' appeal against the Panel's interpretation that Article 6.4 requires attribution to all Members the imports from whom cause serious damage or actual threat thereof. In this respect, we note that the scope of this dispute is defined by Pakistan's claims before the Panel. Pakistan claimed that the United States acted inconsistently with Article 6.4 because it "attributed serious damage to imports from Pakistan without making a comparative assessment of the imports from Pakistan and Mexico and their respective effects".⁹⁵ The Panel considered it necessary, in its reasoning, to rule on the broader interpretative question of whether Article 6.4 requires attribution to all Members the imports from whom cause serious damage or actual threat thereof.⁹⁶ The United States also appeals the Panel's interpretation on this broader question. However, our findings⁹⁷ resolve the dispute as defined by Pakistan's claims before the Panel. We, therefore, do not rule on the issue of whether Article 6.4 requires attribution to all Members the imports from whom cause serious damage or actual threat thereof. In these circumstances, the Panel's interpretation on this question is of no legal effect.

VII. Findings and Conclusions

128. For the reasons set out in this Report, the Appellate Body:

(a) concludes that the Panel exceeded its mandate under Article 11 of the DSU by considering United States Census data for the calendar year 1998;

(b) upholds the Panel's finding, in paragraph 8.1(a) of its Report, that the United States acted inconsistently with Article 6.2 of the ATC, by excluding from the scope of the
